A Rich History of Public Transport

The story of municipal transport in Lancashire begins in the early 19th century with the of horse-drawn buses and trams. These early forms of public transportation were essential to the growth of Lancashire's towns and cities, providing a vital link between people and their places of work and leisure.

In the late 19th and early 20th centuries, the of electric trams and motor buses revolutionized public transport in Lancashire. These new technologies allowed for faster, more efficient, and more comfortable travel. Tram networks were established in many of Lancashire's towns and cities, including Manchester, Liverpool, Blackpool, and Rochdale.

The Post-War Era

After World War II, the municipal transport industry in Lancashire faced a number of challenges. The rise of the automobile led to a decline in public transport use, and many tram networks were closed down. However, buses remained an important form of public transport in Lancashire, and new technologies, such as the one-person-operated bus, helped to improve efficiency.

Local Government Reorganization

The 1974 local government reorganization had a significant impact on municipal transport in Lancashire. The Greater Manchester Passenger Transport Executive (GMPTE) was established to oversee public transport in Greater Manchester, while the Merseyside Passenger Transport Executive (MPTE) was created to oversee public transport in Merseyside. These new organizations took over the operation of buses and trams from the local authorities.

The Modern Era

In the 1980s and 1990s, the public transport industry in Lancashire underwent a period of deregulation. This led to the privatization of many bus services and the emergence of new operators. Today, a wide range of bus operators provide services in Lancashire, including Stagecoach, Arriva, Go North West, and Transdev.

In recent years, there has been a renewed focus on public transport investment in Lancashire. New bus lanes and priority measures have been introduced to improve journey times, and new trams have been introduced in Manchester and Blackpool.
